ALEJANDRO M LOPEZ

Introduction

My work explores the spiritual dimension of nature and our shared existence within it. Each painting is created in remote landscapes, where the act of hiking and climbing becomes a form of meditation. In that stillness, I paint live, responding not to what I see, but to what I feel: the energy, movement, and presence of the natural world.

About the Artist

Alejandro M. Lopez was born in Los Angeles and, after studying at Art Center College of Design, spent 25 years living and painting across four continents. He now works between California and Japan.

His practice is rooted in immersion. Often spending weeks alone in nature, his work reflects direct, lived encounters with some of the world's most powerful landscapes. Rather than literal representation, he draws on his training in the five elements to capture the essence and energy of a place.

Working with raw Belgian linen and handmade surfaces, Alejandro blends Eastern and Western techniques, combining sumi ink, mineral pigments, and traditional Japanese materials with contemporary mediums. Each piece is created outdoors, leaving space and minimal gesture to evoke the timeless, ever-changing force of nature.

About the Work

Drawn to remote, untouched landscapes far removed from human presence, Alejandro creates his work using materials that are as organic and natural as possible. His canvases are made from Belgian linen, often stretched over white birch plywood and handcrafted by the artist himself. Rather than using bleached surfaces, he selects unbleached linen to preserve its natural texture, allowing the raw character of the material to remain visible.

The coarse surface of the linen demands a greater density of paint, resulting in layered, dimensional strokes that embody the fluidity of nature. The interplay of ink and paint reflects a unique visual language that merges Eastern and Western traditions. Through years of experimentation, Alejandro has developed a distinctive technique combining Japanese materials—such as sumi ink, pigments, and washi—with Western acrylic-based media.

Guided by subtle intuition and light, his process unfolds as if led by nature itself. His works often retain areas of untouched space, allowing the energy of the landscape to resonate. With minimal strokes and restrained form, he captures moments in which his inner nature aligns with the greater rhythms of the natural world.
