About the Work

Drawn to remote, untouched landscapes far removed from human presence, Alejandro creates his work using materials that are as organic and natural as possible. His canvases are made from Belgian linen, often stretched over white birch plywood and handcrafted by the artist himself. Rather than using bleached surfaces, he selects unbleached linen to preserve its natural texture, allowing the raw character of the material to remain visible.

The coarse surface of the linen demands a greater density of paint, resulting in layered, dimensional strokes that embody the fluidity of nature. The interplay of ink and paint reflects a unique visual language that merges Eastern and Western traditions. Through years of experimentation, Alejandro has developed a distinctive technique combining Japanese materials—such as sumi ink, pigments, and washi—with Western acrylic-based media.

Guided by subtle intuition and light, his process unfolds as if led by nature itself. His works often retain areas of untouched space, allowing the energy of the landscape to resonate. With minimal strokes and restrained form, he captures moments in which his inner nature aligns with the greater rhythms of the natural world.
